Architecture of CapitaGreen

CapitaGreen is designed by Japanese architect Toyo Ito. It is being called the "Big Tree in the City".

At the top of CapitaGreen building is a flower-like structure that helps draw cool air into its centre. The flower petals, or "wind scoops" at the rooftop of CapitaGreen channel cool air into the centre of the building, deliberately left a void; the cool air circulates down to the lower levels.

CapitaGreen is designed like a plant growing towards the sun - has plants growing such that they will eventually cover more than half the facade.

"Singapore used to be covered in forests, but as the city developed, all the greenery had been lost. There must be ways to recover it." Architect Toyo Ito on why he covered CapitaGreen with greenery.

CapitaGreen won the 2015 Best Tall Building Award for Asia & Australasia Region at the Council on Tall Buildings and Urban Habitat awards this year. It is one of the greenest buildings in Singapore's CBD.

There are a few art pieces around the building. They are the Living World Series by Ju Ming, Above Below Beneath Above by Olafur Eliasson, 2x2 II by Antony Gormley and La Rencontre by Etienne.

The ground floor lobby is expansive, with a triple-height ceiling.
